
Challenges Faced by Native Americans in 21st Century

History began with the settlements of Americas by the Paleo-Indian. At that time the Indian Americans were well known for the racism group. In the 21st century, the Native American has faced the drastic type of racism by the Americans on the basis of their language, culture, race etc. over the range of issues the tribes, as well as the individual of the Native Americans, began to file the suits against the federal government. Moreover, at the time the major issue is related to the land claims as well as the management of the land claims and fees.

The Native Americans also faced the violence on the women, due to this reason the government has set the violence against women act but the person who were not tribal members under this act, those people were extended to the Indian country. In 2012, seventy percent of the Native Americans were migrated to the urban areas. On the other side, the major urban areas that were significant for the urban areas were Denver, Tucson, Houston, Los Angeles etc. it is the fact that the Native Americans faced the racism but in the 21st century it has reduced.

According to the 2010 census, there were 5.2 million Native Americans lived in the United States. There are many factors due to Native Americans have faced the issues such as the economics, health etc. Today, in the United States the government has provided the equal opportunity to the Native Americans in every field. Moreover, the government of US has provided the employment opportunity to those Native American who have qualified. For reducing the racism for the Native Americans the government of the country plays an important role. For this reason, the government of the United States has played their role in the reduction of the racism for the Native American.

Additionally, the government of the United States has developed the various acts and laws. On the basis of these laws and acts, the Native Americans have an ability to gain their rights.. There were 3.5 times more women raped or sexually assaulted

By summing up all it can be said that the Native American has faced many challenges in the 21st century but with the time all the challenge has recovered due to the rules and regulations of the American government. At that time the racism is the most major issue for the Native Americans.
