
Element of story boarding

Story

The first primary element of a storyboard is the story it tells. By creating the story in sequential order on a storyboard, the creator can visually see if the story makes sense, is complete or is missing in key information. A storyboard also helps the creator organize and insert key details and points from the story in a logical manner.

Characters

A storyboard also contains the characters in the story which is an important element of a storyboard. When creating a storyboard, most creators use pen or pencil and are not concerned with making the characters look good in order to save time. Some people even use stick figures instead of drawing complete characters. The storyboard illustrates the actions of the characters, such as the way they are moving or what they are doing. Dialogue Dialogue is also an element of a storyboard.

A storyboard not only shows the characters in the story, but also shows what the characters are saying and the speech of the characters is called dialogue. It can also illustrate the tone of voice the characters use, such as the loudness of the words, or specific types of feelings that words can produce, such as anger, sarcasm or excitement.

Time Frame

Time frame is another most important element of storyboard. Storyboards also contain notes about time frames, such as how much time will be used in a specific scene, or how much time passes between frames. This element of a storyboard helps writers narrow down a story to a specific amount of time.

Camera Details

Numerous different terms are commonly used in the production of storyboards, especially when referring to the camera details. The storyboard illustrates where the camera should be positioned, and shows which frames are close-up shots or shots with a moving camera. Other camera terms include 'Dissolve', which occurs when the camera fades out of one shot and into another and 'Zoom', which is when the camera moves close to the picture.
