
The Role of the National Disability Insurance Scheme

The National Disability Insurance Scheme (NDIS) is a plan that is aimed at providing insurance services to Australians, who have a permanent disability. The NDIS plays various roles in the lives of the disabled individuals. The main aim of the scheme is to ensure that those who are disabled within the community have been empowered to achieve their goals in life. The primary concern is to improve their involvement in various communal activities, independence, employment and most importantly their standards of living. Moreover, the NDIS provides useful information to those who take care of such in the society (O'Connor, 2014). Additionally, the scheme has a strategy to ensure that over 460,000 Australians with disabilities have been supported. Various principles guide the implementation and operation of the plan as there is a need to develop strategies to protect the disabled.

The disabled people should be able to meet specific criteria that are set for them to get their necessary support. For instance, there is a need for one to ensure that they have needs and goals, which the society should them achieve. There are various critical stages that one passes through before they access the help provided by the NDIS. Four significant steps are included in the pathway to the NDIS. The first step is to ensure that contact has been made to the person who needs help within the community. Contact can be made by phone, internet or visiting an NDIS office that is within reach. Secondly, it is so that eligibility is checked as the second step before a conversation is made with the client. The third step is to create a conversation, and the fourth one is to formulate a plan on how to provide services to the disabled. The services being offered can be in the form of special treatment or communal one, which can benefit all the people.

Question 1: Part B

The first consideration should be based on circumstances as there are various reasons as to why people are disabled. For instance, when supporting a person who is deaf, one should apply a different technique from what should be done when talking to a blind person. Moreover, there is no likelihood that help issued generally can be significant. It is important to discover one's needs in relation to their disability before considering supporting them. It is also important to consider the driving factor behind each circumstance in the lives of the disabled. When one is helping a disabled person find and navigate information on the NDIS website, there is a need for them to consider specific conditions, which are involved.

react to various occurrences. For instance, the Australian people have grown to develop differences, which are notable when it comes to the way of life. The disabled need care and love from each member of the society. The different settings within the country have in one way or the other influenced changes in the lives of the disabled people. Diversity is one aspect that has a significant impact on the eligibility of a person to gain funding from NDIS.

Culture is crucial when it comes to helping the needy and disabled to rediscover their lives and achieve the set goals (Marston, Stafford, Chamorro-Koc, Beatson, & Drennan, 2017). Different people from different parts of the world have diversified cultural practices, which must be considered when one is offering help. For instance, some cultural practices are considerate to the disabled while others are not. When navigating the website, it is essential that consideration is given to one's cultural surrounding. Fashion, tastes, preferences, and choices are some of the key factors one should provide. NDIS is one scheme that can benefit many in the society who are disabled.

Question 2: Advocacy

Advocacy refers to the act and process of representing or standing on for a disabled person. For instance, two major types of advocacy can be attributed to helping the disabled. Moreover, advocacy can be expressed when one tries to find a solution or fight for the rights of those who are disabled in one way or the other (Wolfensberger, 1977). National Disability Advocacy Program (NDAP), is a program that was designed to provide effective advocacy for those who are disabled in the society.

The first known type of advocacy is individual advocacy, which is aimed at ensuring that rights of the disabled are upheld. Cases against discrimination, neglect, and abuse are generally considered to be individual advocacy. An ideal epitome of a situation where it can be applied in life is when an advocate is defending a disabled in court against harassment and oppression. The person acting in defense should primarily focus on helping them and ensuring that their rights have always been upheld.

Systematic advocacy represents the second type, which majorly focuses on changing the entire system that is involved, for example, the government. Additionally, systematic advocacy can be directed towards a change of a particular policy that is existent. Moreover, there should be no conflict of interest in the agency representing them, as it should focus on helping the disabled. Its primary role is to ensure that policies, which are oppressive to the disabled are amended to satisfactory standards. An example of a situation where systematic advocacy applies in real life is when an organization acts in activism to protect the disabled in the society. Systematic advocacy is common in systems that do not take into consideration rights of the disabled in the region.

Question 3: Person-Centered Planning

Person-centered planning is a process that can enable one to discover how a particular disabled person wants to live his/her life. Moreover, it is important to note what one requires for them to achieve their set goals (Sanderson, 2000). For instance, if one wants to become a teacher, person-centered planning will help put in place the right strategies to make it a success. Furthermore, person-centered planning is essential in helping one know what is necessary for them to achieve their set goals. The approach originated due to the need to solve various issues that arose in relation to disabled people. The approach was first applied by a group of people from the United States.

Use of this particular approach is associated with application some principles, which are considered to be essential. For instance, principles of inclusion, community integration, and normalization. Moreover, he approach believes in social role valorization. This is in a bid to ensure that the disabled are treated well and at the same time, protect their rights. Inclusion ensures extensive involvement of the community when coming up with various policies that relate to disability management (Flynn, 2010). In shaping people to have a quality life, it is essential to make the right choices, develop abilities, grow in relationships, share ordinary places and respect for everyone.

An example of a situation representing a person-centered planning is a lady who loves carrying her handbag. The handbag can be containing essential things, which she might need in her operations. The fact that the bag contains a well-laid arrangement of what she needs, it can be referred to as person-centered planning. The approach is widely used by many people to help plan for various circumstances that can improve lives. To help the disabled, the general society needs always to do the right planning.
