Bill Gates and Founding Microsoft

Gates and Allen made Micro-Soft, a combination of small computer and programming. The organization's first product was BASIC programming that ran on the Altair PC. From the start, everything was not going great. Regardless of how Microsoft's BASIC programming program for Altair PC made the association accountable and wavering, it become very difficult to meet the expenses. As Gates 'subsequent records show that there are very few people who paid for using BASIC in Altair PC.

Microsoft's BASIC programming is the mainstream of PC experts, who obtained pre-show copies and re-created and transferred them. Currently, many PC fans have no money. They believe that the simplicity of generation and distribution allows them to pass the program to peers and personal PC enthusiasts. He thought in an unexpected way. In 1976, he wrote an open letter to PC experts, saying that continuing to transmit and use the program without paying any fees would prevent a well-written program from being made.

Basically, stealing programming can make engineers reluctant to spend time and money on high-quality programming. This letter is not popular with PC devotees, but Gates insists on his
